Seminar paper from the year 2013 in the subject English - Pedagogy, Didactics, Literature Studies, grade: 1,2, University of Rostock, language: English, abstract: People recognize, differentiate, and understand, therefore, categorize ideas and objects in everyday life. Unsurprisingly, linguists classify words. Compounds, for instance, are a part of the human language, and an interesting process of word-formation. Is this a compound? Sometimes linguists are unsure whether certain words are compounds or not. The definition of compounds is important because defining compounds simply as being lexeme[s] whose immediate constituents are representatives of lexemes (Bauer 2005: 105) creates a wide array of borderline cases. Since neo-classical compounds and phrasal compounds, for example, do not consist of two words, it is incorrect to categorize these classes as forms of compounding, according to the definition. Additionally, Plag's definition demonstrates that phrasal compounds can be classified as compounds because a phrase and either a root or word are joined together to a word in these complex words. Despite the advantages that this definition reveals, demarcation problems cannot be solved and borderline cases still arise regarding English compounds. [W]e must emphasize that these [continuing, D.S.] classification difficulties are...
