When John Lennon declared in 1966 that the Beatles were more popular than Jesus Christ, teenagers and twentysomethings of the baby boomer generation nodded in agreement and turned a cynical eye toward their parents, who believed otherwise, of course. Scott Stone, in his book, Its a YAD, YAD, YAD World, suggests that this breach contributed to the infamous Generation Gap which resulted in many boomers viewing with cynicism the opinions and practices of their parents. This moved boomers to later adopt a helicopter parenting style with their own children, a pattern of micromanagement that valued love and honesty above all else, while trying to protect their offspring from the frailties and evils of the world. Fast forward to today, where recent economic conditions and other social circumstances have driven those children to return home to live with their parents as young adult dependents or YADs, an apt coinage by the author. Many have moved back to the sanctuary of their childhood bedrooms, emerging only to clean out the family cupboards and camp out on the living room sofa, playing video games, texting, and hogging the flat-screen TV instead of making their way in the real world. Stone explains why boomers must accept partial responsibility for what he calls the infestation of YADs in their homes. Their dotting parental style contributed to their childrens dependence, and the technology-dominated society in which theyve been immersed since birth has further isolated them from the worlds realities, making many of them poor communicators. They certainly arent listening to their parents message to get on with their lives outside of their childhood homes. Through scholarly investigation as well as historical and personal anecdotes and pop culture...
