If subterfuge, or smart dealing, or what is usually denominated logrolling, was necessary to success, he would never have been rightly selected as a leader. His sterling professional character, his genuine love for dentistry and for his professional brothers, won the hearts of all true men in the profession. A very natural result of these associated traits made him prominent in the associations, local or State or national. He was made President in turn of every association to which he ever belonged. In the American Dental Association he was made President in 1870, and in 1882 was called the second time to the chair, for Dr. Goddard, who was absent on account of sickness, making a unique and highly valued compliment. With him dental meetings were made the postgraduate courses of his professional training, from which he obtained an unequalled comprehension of the principles underlying dentistry. Coupled with his clear comprehension, working in double harness with it, so to speak, was a zeal that knew no tiring and a courage that never faltered. That ancestral line of warriors would never have had to blush because his heart ever faltered in a crisis. On the very contrary, he was brave to rashness, his weakness was to be found in his too rugged and unbending strength of character. Once convinced, he had no comprehension of retreat or concession or backout, and the grip of his mind and the fearlessness of his advance were to be likened only to...
