As the Capital Express train dashed into the village of Bruceton one bright afternoon, a brakeman passing through a car was touched on the shoulder by a man, who said, The man that left this in the seat in front got out three stations back. You dont spose hell want it again an send back for it, do you The brakeman looked at an object which the speaker held up as he spoke: it was a small fig-box, such as train-boys sometimes succeed in imposing upon the traveling public, and it still contained several figs. Want it again said the brakeman, with a scornful curl of the lip that gave his black moustache a Mephistophelian twist, of course not. He left it there sos to get rid of it, like most of em do. I wouldnt buy one of them boxes of The brakeman suddenly ceased talking, and put both hands on the passengers shoulders with the movement peculiar to train-men whose duty it is to rouse sleeping passengers, the effect always being to make the victim throw his head slightly backward. Then the brakeman looked a moment into the face before him, it was small, weak-eyed, and characterless, and continued, Why, Sam Kimper, I didnt know you from Adam! That broad-brimmed low hat makes you look like somebody else. When did you get out This mornin, said the passenger, dropping his eyes. This item ships from La Vergne, TN. Paperback.
