But away we went, taking another view of the old home of Dai-butsu among the hills that had sheltered the spot long before he made it sacred-- Long ere great Buddha strode Upon his calm, colossal, godlike way O'er the broad rolling rivers of Cathay, By the Korean road, And stepping stormy seas Hither, to mount the golden lotus throne Of Nara, there to rule and muse alone, Through lingering centuries. Passing once more the grim gatekeepers, away we rolled, merrily through the merry morning, past the old temples and pagodas; among the staring people; between the huge lanterns of the portal, and on to the westward-spreading plain over which eleven hundred years ago the imperial sacred city shone. On our right lay large mounds, the tombs of emperors and empresses, each one of whom has been a god for ages past. Over their tombs spread clumps of pine-trees, and beneath the pines stand their shrines, to which a people reverent, and with cause, of their ancestral gods resort to breathe forth their simple prayers. About a mile and a half from the present boundary we reached a village, at which the road turned right and left, and it was to this point that the ancient capital extended. Three fourths of a mile on the southern road stands a pagoda, and this, in those old days,...
