Excerpt from Hot Air Bathing: Its Philosophy and Advantages in Health and Disease The heat is generated in a brick furnace placed under the sidewalk. From the middle of the ceiling of the third room a constant current of cold air is distributed through out the several apartments, and as the heavy air gravitates to the floor, it is taken out through openings near the floor to transverse channels under the shampooing couches which are made continuous, and conveyed to a general ventilating shaft, two feet by six, 100 feet high, and heated so as to act like an exhaust pump in removing foul air. Into this each individual room also has its opening, and each apartment thereby constantly parts with its impure air and receives constantly a supply of fresh air. No checks or dampers are provided, and, as heat is the mode of motion and the supply continuous, the atmosphere is constantly renewed and purified, supplying cold air to breathe and rendering the ventilation practically automatic - a desideratum which has never hitherto been accomplished in ancient...
