At the last annual meeting of the Virginia Association for the Advancement of Higher Education, I read a brief paper urging the collection of material scattered about everywhere throughout the State, but more particularly in connection with our institutions of learning, with a view to having ultimately written a history of the educational, intellectual, literary, and social life of Virginia. At the same time, as preparatory and essential to this work, I stressed the importance of research and independent investigation generally, and particularly in our methods of teachings - not so as to make colleges of high schools, and universities of colleges, but leaving each to work within its proper sphere, so as to allow the teacher to be as suggestive and stimulating as possible with the pupils, to implant within them an enthusiasm and desire to work for themselves, to collect material for purposes of their own interest and discovery, and to be observant recorders and faithful interpreters of the truth. It seemed to me that this habit of thought and thinking, and the methodical treatment of a subject with a definite purpose and distinct spirit, were as important aims as the accumulation of detailed facts and principles, whether from teachers lips or from the pages of text-books.
