Excerpt from The Work of Eugene Sue, Vol. 4 of 20: Illustrated With Original Etchings From the window, a corner Of blue sky was scarcely perceptible over the masses of irregularly built roofs, garrets, and tall chimneys, which bounded the horizon on the other side of the street. Suddenly a sunbeam, which, as it were, wandered for a moment between two high gables, came for an instant to purple with its bright rays the windows of the young girl s chamber. Rigolette was at work, seated by her window; and the soft Shadow of her charming profile stood Out from the transparent light of the glass as a cameo of rosy whiteness on a silver ground. Brilliant hues played on her jet black hair, twisted in a knot at the back of her head, and shaded with a warm amber colour the ivory of her industrious little fingers, which plied the needle with incomparable activity. The long folds Of her brown gown, confined at the waist by the bands Of her green apron, half concealed her straw-seated chair, and her pretty feet rested...
