The field was well-nigh untrodden, when I set forth upon its exploration and in its trackless ways, my feet have led me over deserts as well as lands of promise. When my articles appeared in Architecture and Building they were often valuable as a means of stating that which I sought to prove, and of recalling later what part of it I found to be unprofitable, but at the end of some of these early statements I now may write, Quod erat demonstrandum. These I have collected in the following pages which I humbly submit to you in the selfish hope that tile s swift progress may not outstrip its printing press and antique its new-born chronicle. I wish to acknowledge my indebtedness to those good friends who have aided me with picture and experience in this story of a material to which they all are partisan. In particular, I thank my partners, past and present, whose drawings and pictures, collected the world over, have furnished the high lights for the illustrations. Then, too, there are manufacturers, Fiske Company and the National Fire-proofing Company, who have lent photographs in the same spirit of public education which marks their business policy. Publications like Concrete-Cement Age, the...
