Not illustrated. 1916 Excerpt: . . . backing the Midge gave them, and there was the mahogany and brass, just like that which he had seen in his boyhood, except that it was more shiny. There was only one thing in the room that he had bought uncontrolled and unaided, and that was the brass bedstead, with its light chintz-draped tester. And he never would have bought that if the Midge had not casually and artlessly described such a bed, which she had seen in a stolen peep into the apartments of some royal personage in a French watering-place hotel. The general effect was creditable to the Midge. He had had to chasten her somewhat extravagant taste in certain particulars. She had expressed a yearning, repressed at his especial desire, for white and gold; and he felt that he had not been too firm. He had been obliged to deny her a bisque...
