Smartphones, learning, and hands in the dirt; reconnect with your senses to reconnect with this world. <https://shimshonobadia.com/thesensoryexploration> I dont know a world without the internet. So when I noticed that my students were standing beside a beautiful Creekside and they were Snapchatting on their smartphones with classmates less than a metre away from me, why did I leap to the conclusion that they were using the technology to escape rather than engage with their immediate environment As it turned out, they were Snapchatting about the creek we were working on in that class. This experience prompted me to delve deeper into this workshops theme, the sensorial connection between the human and the more-than-human, through technology. This process took place in five parts spread over one year. Once a week, for five months, I worked with students from the newly established project-based learning focused, Vernon Community School in British Columbias Okanagan Valley. Using the tools available to us, from a couple of pencil crayons to the smartphones in our pockets, we learned in, and collaborated with, the natural world; discovering and getting to know the more-than-human members of our community in a riparian area behind the school. Our goal was to co-create with our environment using new media and performance-based eco art. We attempted to reclaim the use of our senses in the natural world, aiming to reconnect with our human right and responsibility of planetary stewardship. Each one of the five parts focused on a mutual exploration of one of the five human senses between us and our more-than-human collaborators. And at the end of this co-creation experience, participants invite their community to a public art sharing in...
