The women catch the blood in a wooden bowl, in which they allow it to cool, after having freed it from albumen by stirring it with the hand. While this is being done, the men turn the animal on to its back, cut open the skin from the lower lip to the root of the tail, and at each hoof they make other cuts meeting the first at the chest and at the lower part of the belly. They begin by detaching the skin of the neck, the chest, and the thin parts with their knives, and finish the work with their hands alone, seizing the skin firmly with the left, and passing the right between the skin and the flesh. When the flaying is completed, they separate the head from the trunk, remove the...
